

only too glad to take the earliest opportunity of making their acquaintance and welcoming them to our ranks but in the absence of any means of identification, nothing can be done at present in this direction

We are all agreed that the Full Dishes, Good Wine, Good Humour and even the Good Music, are mere accessories to the main object in view which is to improve and make lasting that Harmony and Friendship which reign among us

To assist us towards this object I venture to suggest the adoption of a badge to be worn at the dinners and other gatherings by all members of the Company

The form such badge should take is immaterial to the object in view but the idea which has occurred to me and which with great diffidence I submit for consideration is as follows:

A round plaque of silver to be worn in the button hole bearing the crest of the Company in the centre with the name of the Company and its motto in raised letters round the circumference. The attached rough sketch will perhaps make my meaning clearer but the actual badge should be much smaller than the sketch. The whole design would be punched in one piece and should have a false back enclosing a piece of silk which might be blue for Liverymen and red for members of the Court being thus a further distinguishing mark while serving the purpose of throwing up the design. Past Masters have already a decoration and would not need this badge but if it were adopted by them it should in their case be gilt

Such a badge would be quite inexpensive when once the dies were cut and if the Company would pay for the dies and sell the badges
