Marching song

A letter from the Master was read stating that both Mr Studyard Tipling and Sir Conan Doyle had refused to write the words of the Marching song and that if the Court thought it desirable he would willingly offer a prize of Twenty Guineas for the best worded song submitted in competition. The Master was thanked for his generous offer and Mr Hill said he thought that Mr W. H. Ash would prefer to make any necessary payments himself and the matter was referred back to the Committee to which Colonel Shaw Hellier was added

Mr Southgate suggested that the Committee might have power to add to their number from outside the Company but Mr Hadden objected on the ground that this would create a dangerous precedent and this view was supported by Mr Hill. Mr Southgate accordingly withdrew his suggestion and it was decided that the present Committee should have power to add to their number from members of the Company if they thought fit
